LABOR COMPLIANCE

Evolving Employee Data & Privacy

We live in a world where companies are intentionally and unintentionally collecting vast amounts of data about employees' activities. This data encompasses various sources, ranging from obvious ones like badge swipes, GPS, timekeeping, and VPN logs, to more discreet sources like behavior AI, biometrics, facial recognition, and beyond. While these systems serve legitimate business purposes in enhancing security and productivity analysis, it is important to recognize that they can also have unintended consequences and significant risks if not effectively managed.

Companies also have additional obligations stemming from the data they collect on their employees, increasing their obligations around employee's data privacy.

Certain statutory requirements apply to specific types of data, such as biometric information governed by Illinois' Biometric Information Privacy Act (BIPA). Employees have the right to request access to their personal information or data under state laws like the California Consumer Privacy Act (CCPA) and the California Privacy Rights Act (CPRA). The National Labor Relations Board (NLRA), moreover, are laser focused on typical monitoring technologies, and run-of-the-mill data collection might now be considered unlawful surveillance under the NLRA. This has now increased obligations and risk for companies, regardless of their employees' union status. iDS can help you manage these risks.

Evaluate Your Obligations

While your data and obligations are unique, the process of evaluating and understanding those obligations follows a standard format. This simple four-phase approach allows companies of all sizes to gain a comprehensive understanding of their data, requirements, employees, and, most importantly, their obligations.

Understanding alone is not enough; meeting obligations and being prepared to provide proof are crucial.

When defining obligations, consider the following elements:

- ☐ Do you know the data you collect and retain?
- ☐ Do you understand what you monitor versus what you store?
- ☐ Are you familiar with the relevant statutory and regulatory requirements governing this data?
- ☐ Can you justify each of these practices with a legitimate business need?
- ☐ Are employees informed, and do you obtain the necessary consent (written if required)?
- ☐ Do you have policies and controls for data access and retention?
- ☐ Are you prepared to respond to inquiries, such as those from the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) or Data Subject Access Requests (DSARs)?
